Folk Artists Go High-Tech

With support from the National Endowment for the Arts, nearly two dozen folk artists from Iowa and neighboring states are learning how to teach and market their art practice online. They recently participated in the first of two workshops co-hosted by the Iowa Arts Council and the Vesterheim Norwegian-American Museum and Folk Art School. The workshop is designed to help artists use high-tech tools, such as iPads and ring lights, to demonstrate old traditions and techniques.

Jess Hirsch of Minneapolis discussed her studio set up for hosting virtual classes during the folk-arts workshop on June 26.

Grantee Spotlight: Brunnier Art Museum

To mark the 25th anniversary of a landmark exhibition that explored the ecology and culture of Iowa's Loess Hills, Iowa State University Museums has organized a new exhibition, "Compelling Ground: Landscapes, Environments and People of Iowa," that honors the original exhibit's vision and examines changes that have taken place over the last quarter century. As with the original exhibit, artists were asked to create art inspired by Iowa, but this time, the entire state was open for interpretation. Nineteen artists contributed works to the exhibit, supported in part by an Iowa Arts Council Arts Project grant. The exhibition closes July 23, with a reception and talk set for 2-4 p.m. July 11.
