Introduction

A century ago, the majority of workers were employed near their homes—on farms or in cities and towns. As industrialization increased and suburbs surrounded central cities, commuting meant going from homes in suburbs to jobs in cities. Today, there is a growing trend of workers commuting between suburbs. On any given day, 61,775 workers commute to jobs in Iowa counties other than the one in which they live.

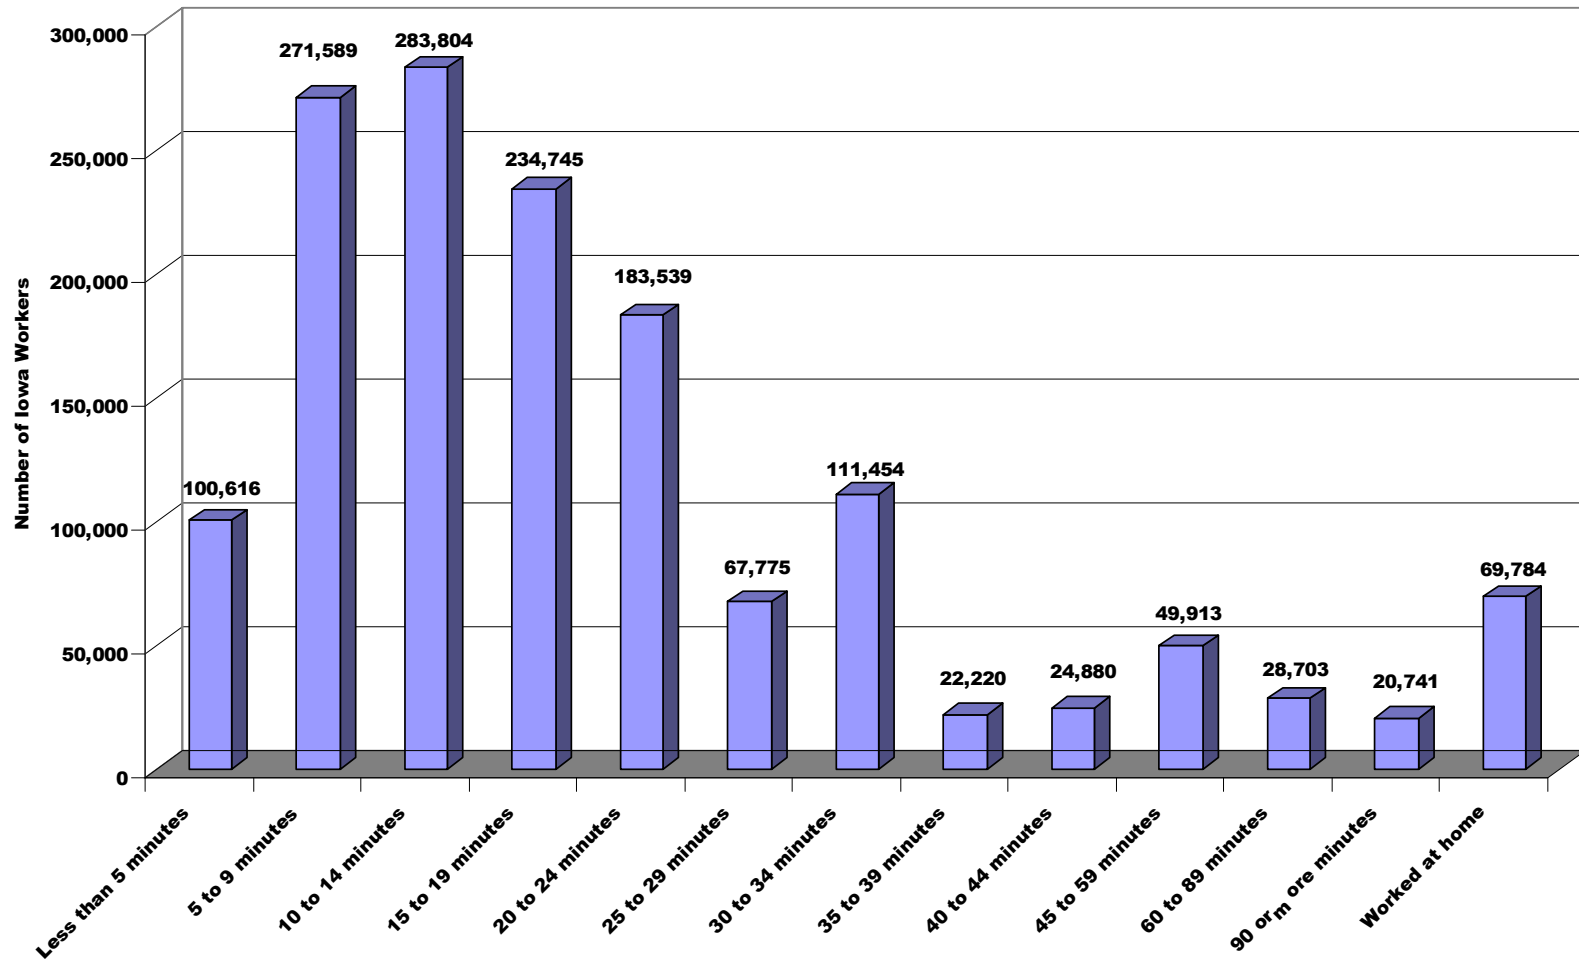

The most important reason for increased commuting has been employment growth. Rising incomes and the growth of suburbs have also been factors. In the past, the increased employment of women added to the number of commuters.

Commuting patterns are a key consideration in transportation planning. In more urban states than Iowa, there is concern that the use of mass transit continues to decline. In Iowa, where so much of our commuting is between counties, private vehicles are often the only practical means of getting to and from work. On any given day, 1,155,008 single-occupancy vehicles are driven to and from jobs somewhere in Iowa. At the same time, an additional 158,699 workers share rides by participating in carpools.

It seems that travel time is no obstacle to keeping Iowans from their jobs as an average of 257,911 Iowans spend at least an hour per day driving to and from work. It is not unusual for more Iowans to work outside their home counties than in them. For example, 12,659 Warren County residents commute to jobs in Polk County, while only 7,500 are employed in their county of residence.

The information Iowa Commuting Patterns, 2000 is compiled from the Census 2000 County-to-County Worker Flow Files (Census Bureau U.S. Department of Commerce) as part of Iowa Workforce Development's continuing effort to provide timely localized Labor Market Information to Iowa businesses, educational institutions, and government entities.
